Wind Wolves Project Study Area

These places have more than a touch of the legendary about them, mythologized as the Native Chamash and neighboring indigenous Californians were attracted to these compelling formations, where they painted a form of rock-art exceptional by anyone's standard—fascinating figures depicting insects, reptiles, birds, bears, humans, or strange combinations, often with upturned appendages or embellished with fine lines and delicate details. Other images, of the Californian interior remains one of the most enigmatic and exquisite phenomena found in the Americas.

The surreal photographs of the Californian Chamash have been recognized since the 1960s as among the most elaborate and exquisite examples of rock-art found anywhere on the continent. Yet, unlike some other regions (where rock-art sites have been the focus of If we excavation), scant attention has been paid itself to investigating these paintings in terms of trying the archaeological future and materials held surrounding them. Because of this, we have little comprehension of the context within which these often vibrant and colorful wall paintings were made, either throughout over 10,000 years of indigenous prehistory nor across within historical times.

Printed on rock surfaces above the soils and sediments that regularly contain quite surprisingly rich archaeology remains, the art leaves as if in a timeless "otherworldly" present, separated from the material life led by the very people who lived as waterfowl and the art, and from those who must have made it.
